

Asian American Architects/Engineers Association Presents:

Changing Course – Higher Education Building Programs in Southern California Thursday, April 16, 2015 - 11:30am-1:30pm

About the Program:

The Southern California Higher Education building programs has been the staple for the building industry for the past several decades. With steady growth and increased demands, both the Los Angeles Community College District and California Institute of Technology have been models for development and growth in Southern California Higher Education Market. The Los Angeles Community College District has been at the forefront of all community college districts and has served as educator to more than three million students. The current $6 billion sustainable building program on its 9 college campuses is one of the nation's largest green construction efforts. California Institute of Technology, known for its world renowned research and numerous Nobel Laureates, has been the model campus for sustainability, preservation, and research. On its 124 acre campus, Caltech has been able to implement its impressive capital campaign while preserving the history and integrity of the original Bertram Goodhue master plan.

Leading professionals from LACCD and California Institute of Technology will be presenting updates on:

- The different models for project delivery.
- Alternative Financing models.

Don't miss this opportunity to learn about these important projects and the associated upcoming contract opportunities for the entire AEC community.
